Teen Big Brother is here!

Living with people you don't know could be fun or a nightmare! Eight British teenagers recently had the chance of a lifetime: to be Big Brother housemates. With the world watching them, they had ten days to get to know each other since they came from different backgrounds and cultures and had just one thing in common - their age.

Caroline and Hasan were the first to arrive in the house. Caroline was confident and positive about their new home and this attracted Hasan to her. They got on very well. However, when Jade, the third housemate arrived, she was anxious, nervous and stressed, and could not make eye contact. James, on the other hand, was very friendly and made a good first impression. He introduced himself and said, 'Nice to meet you'. Paul, Shaneen and Tracey were all very likeable from the start because they were honest. When Caroline asked how they were feeling, they admitted they were scared and this is often a way to win friends. When Tommy finally burst into the house, he appeared confident and arrogant. It was difficult for the quieter housemates to approach him.

Over the course of ten days, the group got to know each other, and sometimes dislike each other! They had to put up with each other's habits, attitudes and personalities. They learned to live as a group and make decisions together. The programme showed how they got on with each other in different situations. The housemates had to do various tasks together. These varied from unblocking the toilet and planning shopping lists to controlling a simulated aeroplane.

So how was the Big Brother house different from home? The main difference was that these housemates were on TV every day. However, Big Brother told them there would be no communication with the outside world except in emergencies. The show's organisers also told them to leave mobile phones at home as well as other personal possessions such as make-up. Ten days without mobiles and make-up is probably difficult for most teenagers. Dr Smith, a psychologist watching the show, said that image was everything to a teenager and personal possessions reflected their personalities to the outside world. He added that Big Brother had stripped the housemates of their identities.

The housemates reacted in different ways to these house rules. Jade had had the strongest reaction to them. She was usually quite a confident girl but without her make-up she became very insecure. James also had difficulty accepting the rules. Inside the house he had tried to hold on to his individuality and had got angry when Big Brother had taken that away. Dr Smith said that Big Brother was a house of individuals, and, whatever Big Brother tried to do, the housemates would always want to remain themselves. When the programme was over, the housemates tried again to show their individuality and some of them even changed their names.

Go on Jude, you can do it!

One night some friends and I were sitting around talking about a new TV programme called Teen Big Brother. We had seen a few 1. (ADVERTISE) for the programme and knew they were looking for 2. (CONTEST). Eight teenagers were going to live together for one week to see how they got on. I said I thought it would be very 3. (EXCITE) being in the Big Brother house on TV. I have always liked the idea of sharing a 4. (COMFORT) house with friends, but my friend Nicole said that Big Brother was 5. (DIFFER) because you would be living with 6. (STRANGE). She said that one week was not 7. (REAL) long enough to get to know each other. Then another friend, Bob, said that it would be 8. (TERROR) living in the house if you were shy and quiet. 'However, Big Brother normally attracts 9. (CONFIDENCE), talkative people,' he said, and continued, 'Go on Jude, you can do it. You get on very well with everybody; you're 10. (FUN) and sociable.'
